

Psychoanalysis and Society: Freud and after
SAIC SOCSCI 3770-001 Fall 2007 MC 315 Thursdays 6 - 9 PM
Instructor: Christopher Cutrone

Course title: Psychoanalysis and Society: Freud and after

Instructor: Chris Cutrone (e-mail: ccutrone@speedsite.com), tutorials by appointment

Course description:

Freud's psychotherapeutic practice and analytic theory of the complex nature of the human psyche, for instance his "discovery" of unconscious mental processes, were profoundly influential for a variety of thinkers and practitioners, including Frantz Fanon, and critical theorists of the Frankfurt School such as Theodor W. Adorno. In this course, we read widely from Freud's writings and those he influenced, including the above authors, with attention to the societal implications of Freud's approach to subjectivity.

Course requirements and grading policy:

This is an advanced, discussion-based undergraduate and graduate course organized as a seminar that meets once per week. Attendance is mandatory; no unexcused absences are allowed.

Class participation consists of student attendance and discussion. Students volunteer for 5-10 minute (2-3 page outlined) class presentations of the readings, consisting of their critical reactions, beyond summary overview, and focusing on 2 or 3 passages or issues from the text(s) to discuss in depth. All students will be expected to attend every class session and bring one or two written reaction questions for each of the assigned readings. Student reactions to the readings (presentations and reaction questions) will guide the class discussions.

The grade evaluation of student performance in the course will consist of 3 components:

1. Attendance and class discussion participation: 15% (~1% per class session)
2. In-class presentations on readings (1 or more per student, depending on enrollment): 10%
3. Writing assignments: 2 of 3 short papers (4-5 double-spaced pages or ~1,000 words): 75%
